FOREWORD

Every State in the United States has enacted laws to protect children from too early or harmful employment and to afford them opportunity for education, training, and recreation during their formative years. The first and most important standard of a child-labor law is the minimum age at which a child may go to work. After the child has entered employment a good child-labor law places around him additional safeguards. These include limitations upon the number of hours per day and per week that he may be employed, prohibition of employment at night, and protection from work in dangerous or injurious occupations. Many State laws also require that a child going to work be in sound health and physically fit for his job, meet certain educational standards, and produce evidence that he is of legal age for employment and that a job has been promised him.

In the administration of State child-labor laws a system of employment certificates has come to be regarded as basic. These certificates, issued usually by departments of labor or by public-school officials, are evidence that a child has met the legal standards for employment, and at the same time protect the employer from unwitting employment of a child below the legal age. Employment certificates also serve as a link between school and work and as a guide to enforcing authorities in seeing that the children are surrounded with the safeguards designed by law to protect them during their period of adjustment to work.

The complement of a child-labor law is the compulsory school-attendance law, since it has been a generally accepted principle that a child should be in school until he goes to work. Every State now requires school attendance up to a specified age, but all permit some exemptions. Nearly half the States require employed minors under 18 to attend part-time or continuation school for a few hours a week.

This summary presents briefly the provisions relating to the basic minimum age for employment, maximum hours of labor, night-work restrictions, employment-certificate provisions, minimum age for employment in hazardous occupations, status of illegally employed minors under the workmen's compensation law, and compulsory school-attendance requirements in effect in each State, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico. Laws governing the employment of minors in theatres, concert halls, and places of amusement are omitted because of limitations of space. All hours-of-labor and night-work laws which specifically regulate employment of minors up to 18 years of age are included, but laws on these subjects which apply to "all employees" or "all females" and do not expressly mention minors, are included only when they constitute the sole regulation for certain groups of minors under 18 years of age in that State.

As will be seen, child-labor laws vary widely both in the standards fixed and in the occupations to which the law applies. These varying provisions make up a composite picture of the most important legal standards affecting the employment of minors in each State, differing from State to State, but in general following a well-defined pattern.
